FOURTH EDITION It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that Personal Injury claims can often be as painful as the injury itself for the victim. Here's an authoritative and definitive text designed to ease the process considerably. Patrick Curran QC and his team have indeed excelled here with 'PI Pleadings', now in its fourth edition. It's an indispensable reference work on the subject which I find particularly helpful for my county court practice, and it functions as a complete working manual, offering everything the busy practitioner needs to settle pleadings in such claims. In the preface to this new 4th Edition, Patrick Curran refers to the 'raison d'être' behind the book by quoting Dyson LJ, who said, 'It is fundamental to our adversarial system of justice that the parties should clearly identify the issues that arise in the litigation.... The starting point must always be the pleadings.' The first edition of the book was therefore written 15 years ago, as a compendium - a collection of pleadings - under discrete headings. The pleadings here in the fifteen chapters are illustrations from actual cases together with the relevant legal principles extracted from the leading authorities in both long-established and contemporary case law. Curran makes an interesting point, writing that modern search engines achieve miraculous speed in producing references, but then (rather unhelpfully) reminds us they produce them by the thousand! 'There is no substitute for the human eye,' he says, 'for discerning the relevant point from the irrelevant' -- hence the practical usefulness of this specialist book on pleadings.
